SANTA CRUZ — Jeremiah Ridgway continued painting with colors he had never seen before. It’s hard to believe that the 8-year-old was born without vision. He is learning to make the most of his remaining sight to take advantage of the opportunities and experiences he can enjoy.

The 30-year-old Santa Cruz con-

He began to paint at about 2 years old, but he didn’t start painting with colors until he was 8. He calls it “his special sight.”

When he paints, he uses his fingers to feel the colors and to make sure he knows where he is. He also uses his nose to feel the colors and to make sure he knows what he is painting.

But he isn’t the only one to benefit from this work. He has a special purpose: to help others.

He is currently working on a special project that will be displayed at his school. It is called “The Art of Light.”

But for Ridgway, it is more than just a project. It is a way to share his love for art and to give others a chance to see something beautiful. He hopes that others will be inspired by his work and will want to create their own.

He is currently working on a special project that will be displayed at his school. It is called “The Art of Light.”

But for Ridgway, it is more than just a project. It is a way to share his love for art and to give others a chance to see something beautiful. He hopes that others will be inspired by his work and will want to create their own.