Cabrillo chorus members protest pending legislation

Currently, noncredit enrollment is free for students. The college still receives state funding for noncredit students, at half the $5,997 rate for credit students.

An act that would seek to eliminate the college’s noncredit program, which is currently free, would also affect some of the college’s programs, including its music education program. However, the chancellor of the college said that the goal of the proposed legislation is not to eliminate the noncredit programs, but rather to make them more affordable for students.

The director of the Cabrillo Choral Program, Emily Martinez, said that the program is facing challenges due to the proposed legislation. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez added that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees. She said that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees. She said that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees. She said that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees. She said that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.

Martinez said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees. She said that the program is facing a similar challenge with the state legislature, which is considering a bill that would limit state funding for community colleges. She said that the program is currently able to offer free music education to students, but that without funding, the program would be forced to charge fees.