THE TWIN POWERS

A new countywide photo exhibit casts an eye toward China and India

By Wallace Broman | wbroman@montereyca.gannett.com | @wbroman on Twitter

One out of every three Earthlings lives in either China or India. These two colossal nations are not only the world’s most populated countries, but they are also among the planet’s most ancient and — at least from the blinkered viewpoint of the relatively young and history-ignorant United States — most mysterious cultures. The contributions of India and China to everything from art to religion is incalculable, and the fate of the world as we know it rests disproportionately on the future of these two geopolitical giants.

“Through Our Lenses” finds six local photographers taking the measures of China and India

The show is curated by Kelli Brosseau, co-director of the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History. The idea for the project was inspired by a conversation with photographer Joel Tanita, who is also a director of the museum. "I wanted to do something that was more focused on the cultural aspects of China and India, and that would bring people together in a fun way,” she said.

The project features 20 images by six local photographers: Colin Mc展区, John Dyer, John Lui, and Sarah Shamma. The photos capture the daily life of these two countries, from bustling cities to rural villages. The exhibit is open to the public and will run through September 20th.

A new countywide photo exhibit casts an eye toward China and India

By Wallace Broman | wbroman@montereyca.gannett.com | @wbroman on Twitter

One out of every three Earthlings lives in either China or India. These two colossal nations are not only the world’s most populated countries, but they are also among the planet’s most ancient and — at least from the blinkered viewpoint of the relatively young and history-ignorant United States — most mysterious cultures. The contributions of India and China to everything from art to religion is incalculable, and the fate of the world as we know it rests disproportionately on the future of these two geopolitical giants.

“Through Our Lenses” finds six local photographers taking the measures of China and India

The show is curated by Kelli Brosseau, co-director of the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History. The idea for the project was inspired by a conversation with photographer Joel Tanita, who is also a director of the museum. "I wanted to do something that was more focused on the cultural aspects of China and India, and that would bring people together in a fun way,” she said.

The project features 20 images by six local photographers: Colin Mc展区, John Dyer, John Lui, and Sarah Shamma. The photos capture the daily life of these two countries, from bustling cities to rural villages. The exhibit is open to the public and will run through September 20th.

A new countywide photo exhibit casts an eye toward China and India

By Wallace Broman | wbroman@montereyca.gannett.com | @wbroman on Twitter

One out of every three Earthlings lives in either China or India. These two colossal nations are not only the world’s most populated countries, but they are also among the planet’s most ancient and — at least from the blinkered viewpoint of the relatively young and history-ignorant United States — most mysterious cultures. The contributions of India and China to everything from art to religion is incalculable, and the fate of the world as we know it rests disproportionately on the future of these two geopolitical giants.

“Through Our Lenses” finds six local photographers taking the measures of China and India

The show is curated by Kelli Brosseau, co-director of the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History. The idea for the project was inspired by a conversation with photographer Joel Tanita, who is also a director of the museum. "I wanted to do something that was more focused on the cultural aspects of China and India, and that would bring people together in a fun way,” she said.

The project features 20 images by six local photographers: Colin Mc展区, John Dyer, John Lui, and Sarah Shamma. The photos capture the daily life of these two countries, from bustling cities to rural villages. The exhibit is open to the public and will run through September 20th.

A new countywide photo exhibit casts an eye toward China and India

By Wallace Broman | wbroman@montereyca.gannett.com | @wbroman on Twitter

One out of every three Earthlings lives in either China or India. These two colossal nations are not only the world’s most populated countries, but they are also among the planet’s most ancient and — at least from the blinkered viewpoint of the relatively young and history-ignorant United States — most mysterious cultures. The contributions of India and China to everything from art to religion is incalculable, and the fate of the world as we know it rests disproportionately on the future of these two geopolitical giants.

“Through Our Lenses” finds six local photographers taking the measures of China and India

The show is curated by Kelli Brosseau, co-director of the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History. The idea for the project was inspired by a conversation with photographer Joel Tanita, who is also a director of the museum. "I wanted to do something that was more focused on the cultural aspects of China and India, and that would bring people together in a fun way,” she said.

The project features 20 images by six local photographers: Colin Mc展区, John Dyer, John Lui, and Sarah Shamma. The photos capture the daily life of these two countries, from bustling cities to rural villages. The exhibit is open to the public and will run through September 20th.

A new countywide photo exhibit casts an eye toward China and India

By Wallace Broman | wbroman@montereyca.gannett.com | @wbroman on Twitter

One out of every three Earthlings lives in either China or India. These two colossal nations are not only the world’s most populated countries, but they are also among the planet’s most ancient and — at least from the blinkered viewpoint of the relatively young and history-ignorant United States — most mysterious cultures. The contributions of India and China to everything from art to religion is incalculable, and the fate of the world as we know it rests disproportionately on the future of these two geopolitical giants.

“Through Our Lenses” finds six local photographers taking the measures of China and India

The show is curated by Kelli Brosseau, co-director of the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History. The idea for the project was inspired by a conversation with photographer Joel Tanita, who is also a director of the museum. "I wanted to do something that was more focused on the cultural aspects of China and India, and that would bring people together in a fun way,” she said.

The project features 20 images by six local photographers: Colin Mc展区, John Dyer, John Lui, and Sarah Shamma. The photos capture the daily life of these two countries, from bustling cities to rural villages. The exhibit is open to the public and will run through September 20th.